

Maryland Workplace Retaliation Lawyers

Employer retaliation against employees is prohibited in Maryland. Workplace retaliation can include dismissal, demotion, shortened schedules, and the like. These actions are made as a result of a protected action, including:

- Filing a complaint about workplace safety
- Making a complaint about race discrimination
- Assisting in government investigations and identifying fraud against the government
- Opposing practices prohibited by the Fair Employment Act

An experienced JGL employment lawyer can guide you through the necessary processes to protect your rights and correct these situations.

What is Workplace Retaliation?

Retaliation in the workplace occurs when an employer, company leader, or co-worker takes negative action against an employee who has filed a complaint about workplace discrimination or harassment. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) recognizes filing a complaint a “protected” activity, therefore such action is illegal and responding to a complaint in an inappropriate manner is prohibited.

Examples of Employer Prohibited Activities

Some clearly prohibited workplace retaliation activities include:

- Preventing employees from attending meetings or other business events
- Denying or postponing a raise or promotion
- Moving an employee from their current department or location
- Negative performance reviews
- Limiting employees hours
- Creating an unsafe or uncomfortable work environment

Here are more subtle examples of workplace retaliation:

- Excessive micro-managing of employees
- Leaving employees out of group activities like lunches, happy hours, etc.
- Ignoring employees in the break room
- Being overly critical of work that was previously deemed acceptable.
- Spreading rumors about

Proving Workplace Retaliation

According to federal case law and regulatory agency guidelines, three necessary elements are required to prove workplace retaliation. There must be a protected activity, followed by an adverse action. And, you should be able to establish a causal connection between the activity and the action.

Permissible Evidence to Prove Workplace Retaliation

There are several types of evidence of retaliation in the workplace. Direct evidence, which proves the existence of a retaliatory motive without inference or presumption. Most commonly, this is a sworn statement by another employee with direct knowledge, whom the jury believes. In such cases, the employee has proven the ultimate issue of retaliation. You can also use call and chat logs, company policies, employee handbooks, performance history and review, emails, letters and memos, personal notes, journal entries, texts, voice messages, videos and other recordings in support of the claim.
